

Zambia's Latitude 15°

Stylish, artistic and pleasing in every way possible, this is Zambia's boutique hotel Latitude 15°

Favoured by discerning travellers

Once a Colonial lodge, Latitude 15° is now Lusaka's stylish boutique hotel. Think design aficionado heaven. Here it's all bespoke, exclusive, repurposed, recycled, boutique, breath-taking and jaw-dropping. You'll find statement pieces in every corner; pieces so fine they'll need to be looked at, studied, sat upon and discussed.

Outside there's an assortment of giant Acacias, vivid shocks of pink bougainvilleae and leafy palms; there are two aqua blue swimming pools and a collection of enormous parasols.

Inside there's an assortment of worn leather hide chairs, antique rugs, repurposed wooden doors from Zanzibar turned into coffee tables, immense African wall art, walls built with bicycle gear cogs and chandeliers made of recycled copper discs and wine-bottle glass shards.

There's no space wasted here. It's quite literally wall-to-wall art. One corner displays a collection of agricultural tools, another a long black and white landscape photograph of galloping antelope, beneath which is a sagging old dark wood sideboard. Here everything is on a huge scale, including the personalities that make it work. Like mixologist, Mike Stanchebani, who's eager to tell visitors about how he got into the business.

On the winning and dining side the chefs are creative, designing dishes that take you on an African culinary adventure. There are 35 bespoke luxury
